You are no stranger to waking up with a stuffy nose, head ache, facial tenderness, bad breath and also a general feeling that you are always worn out, you could be suffering from a sinus infection. Just what is this sinus infection, you might ask? First, you need to know that in people, there are eight sinuses, which are air-filled cavities in the skull. Each sinus communicates to the external environment through their small openings in the nasal passage in order to facilitate draining of mucus and aiding in air exchange. Sinusitis frequently results from a common nasal infection, like that from a simple cold, from nasal allergy, or from any problem which usually alters the normal process of nasal drainage.

The resulting congestion will become a breeding ground for infection which then causes the lining in the sinuses to become inflamed and swollen. In order to make matters worse, the increased amount of mucus that is produced is not able to drain because the sinus openings to the nasal area are blocked. The resulting increased pressure in the sinuses is what causes the nose headaches and facial pain. The traditional treatment for sinusitis is primarily a combination of drugs such as antibiotics, decongestants, analgesics, antitussives, and steroidal nasal sprays. However, if you don't want to resort to each one of these remedies, you can also try these sinus infection home remedies:

The elevated fluid can thin out your mucus secretions so that they can more easily drain out of your sinuses. In the event that you are not such a big fan of plain water, it is great in order to know that the eight glasses required doesn't have to be all purely drinking water. Half of it could be coming from a combination of tea, coffee or juice that you gulp during the day. However, remember that water gets the irresistible edge of being calorie-free. Also, stay away from dairy products as well as too much sugar that will only worsen your own sinus infection symptoms.
